

Cartier

THE PATIALA NECKLACE

JEWEL DESCRIPTION

BRAND Cartier

NAME THE PATIALA NECKLACE

CATEGORY DE BEERS yellow diamond with LADI Five Chains including a diamond studded neck collar

COLLECTION Royal Treasury of Patiala

YEAR 1928

MATERIAL Total 2,930 diamonds, around 962.25 carats, world's seventh-largest diamond "De Beers" and largest cushion-cut yellow diamond of 234.65 carats and the necklace also contained seven other large diamonds ranging from 18 to 73 carats, and a number of Burmese rubies, cubic zirconium that adorned five rows of platinum chains.

COLORS White, Gold, Yellow, Red, Blue

CAMPAIGN and OTHER JEWELS of the collection

MOODBOARD & KEYWORDS

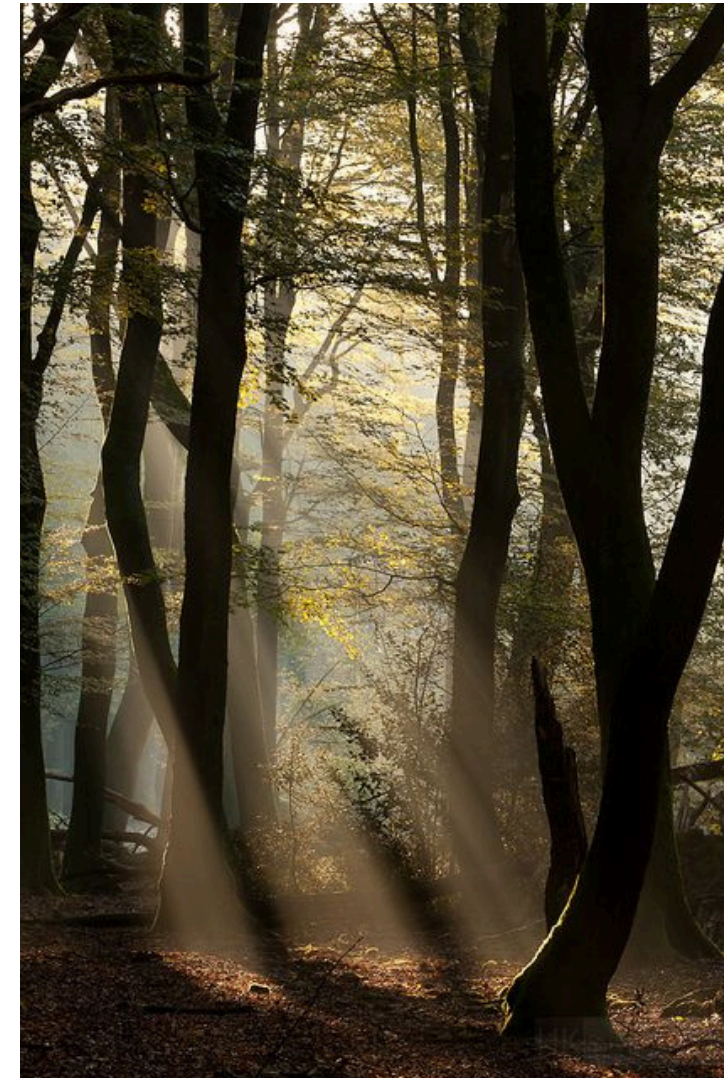

HISTORIC

The Cartier archive reveals that the ceremonial Necklace was born from a trunk of jewels sent to their workshop in Paris. The Maharaja had handpicked jeweller Louis Cartier to craft a magical jewel that married influences of East and West.

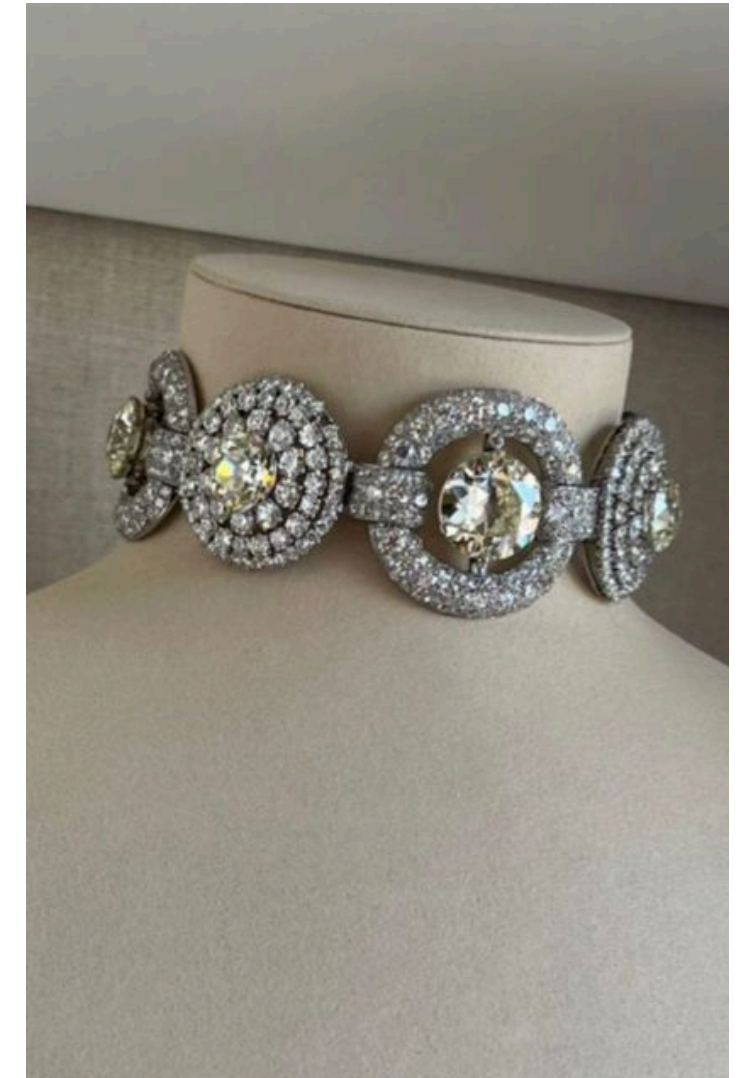

SYMBOLIC

It is subjected to one's belief, but the diamond 'De Beers' was influenced by our most prestigious holy temple "The Golden Temple" which is completely made by gold, inside-out and in sikhism yellow 'kesari' colour is considered auspicious.

MYSTERIC

There have been some sensationalised takes on how and why the necklace was last seen in 1948. The location of the De Beers diamond remains undisclosed and Cartier called this as an "unprecedented adventure"

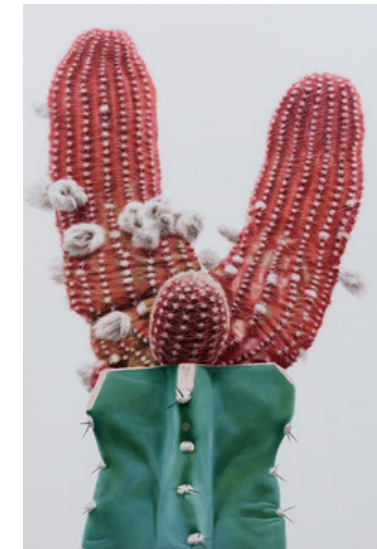

ICONIC

After over 80 years, Cartier disclosed the iconic collar, that landed on neck of Emma Chamberlain as brand ambassador. She donned the diamond collar at the 2022 Met Gala: Gilded Glamour. Although it ended up as a controversial pick.

VALUE & INNOVATION

Luxury is creating scarcity among people by buying exclusivity to depict power

Scaling unconventional larger than life designs to show extravagance

COURAGEOUS STEPPING OUT OF THE BOX

The former Maharaja of Patiala, Bhupinder Singh was the to trump all tastemakers and gave King's like Louis XIV a run for their money. It was 1928 when the Indian royal arrived in Paris and news had spread that the king is notorious for his extravagant taste. It turned out that his majesty's sights were set upon Boucheron, where he ordered to design whopping 149 pieces for his collection, like Emerald and diamond collars, pearl necklaces, and belts made of precious materials.

Maharaja's love affair with European jewellery houses stretched far beyond Boucheron to Cartier in a story that somehow manages to grandeur his place, as the jewel was created to capture the intricate genetics of Indian monarchical culture and style.

Being timeless evoke genuine feelings like memorable, accomplished and pathbreaker

The Maharaja: The Splendour of The Raj exhibited the Patiala necklace, giving insight into the grandeur of India's ruling classes.

This necklace is part of the largest single commission that Cartier has ever executed. The ceremonial necklace was completed in 1928 and restored in 2003 and which contained almost 1,000 carats.

The Patiala Necklace is estimated to be equivalent of ₹210 billion (rupees), US$2.7 billion (dollar) or €2.6 billion (euros). Making it one of the most priced jewellery possession.